“ *I first met Martha in the fall of 1998 when we both started teaching at the newly established Communications Arts High School, the perfect last teaching location for each of us as we were both very much into the growing, ever-changing art of communicating. She, the mentorship teacher, and I, senior English teacher, with side by side portables soon became good friends, sharing in so many plans and activities. When we both retired, I missed Martha in so many ways, and still do. I felt we had a special bond, as I am sure many others also felt. Such friendship is one of the greatest treasures of life. We shared many life lessons between us, but one that we often laughed about together as we found ourselves quoting it at the same time was: "When people tell you who they are, believe them!" And then we would start giggling. Surprising how such moments help you through what would otherwise be hurtful, discouraging, or angering experiences. Memories of our closeness for those last seven years of teaching comfort me, and my only regret is that I did not share that feeling with her as often as I should have. With undying respect and love,
